The UN General Assembly will vote on the final set of SDGs in September 2015, however, as Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon recently stated, it is unlikely that the list of goals and targets will be reduced.
The Post-2015 Partnership Platform for Philanthropy in Indonesia was launched in Jakarta on April 13th, 2015. The initiative seeks to identify opportunities and promote strategic multi-stakeholder partnerships for philanthropy’s collaborative engagement in the Post-2015 Development Agenda, using that agenda and the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) as common ground for collaborative development work.

The Indonesian launch was a joint initiative between the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), Rockefeller Philanthropy Advisors, Foundation Center, Ford Foundation, Conrad N. Hilton Foundation, and The MasterCard Foundation. A series of consultations with philanthropists, government representatives, and UN agencies were held prior to the Platform launch to gather input on key issues and recommendations that will enable the partnership platform. The workshop was opened by Indonesia UN Resident Coordinator Douglas Broderick, Indonesia Philanthropy Association (Perhimpunan Filantropi Indonesia, PFI) Co-founder and chairman Franky Wellirang, and Coordinating Minister for Human Development and Culture H.E. Puan Maharani.

With more than 140 participants from various philanthropic organizations and foundations, the private sector, the Government of Indonesia, development partners, and academia; 2 panel sessions and 4 breakout sessions; and 27 resource people, the workshop is a stepping stone for philanthropists to contribute to the achievement of Indonesia’s SDG goals.

The Post-2015 Partnership Platform for Philanthropy (the Platform) is a global initiative that aims to facilitate international dialogue for collaboration, beginning in these pilot countries: Kenya, Colombia, Indonesia and Ghana. The Platform focuses on philanthropy’s input in the developmental landscape by helping grantmakers better understand the opportunities for engaging in global development goal processes. The Platform will also assist governments and the UN system in understanding the added value of philanthropy’s direct engagement, including amplifying the voice and action of their grantees and partners in determining and achieving international targets and strategies.

The overarching assumption behind this initiative is that deeper understanding, engagement, and contributions by philanthropy around the world will be critical to achieving global development goals. Multi-stakeholder engagement is especially important now, given the global shift from the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) to the Post-2015 Agenda and the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) in January 2016. This, together with a more in-depth understanding by the UN and governments of the role of foundations, will foster both greater and stronger partnerships, enhancing the impact of each stakeholder’s interventions in the long-term.
The Indonesian people believe in working together to achieve a common goal, as we call it ‘Gotong Royong.’ Being a philanthropist is more than just about giving back to society; it is about working together to support people to stand on their own feet, particularly the most disadvantaged. Philanthropists are a great asset to the country, and it’s time for us to have a unified platform that allows us to work together to support our fellow citizens in this vast country.

-H.E. PUAN MAHARANI-
Coordinating Minister of Human Development and Cultural Affairs

Philanthropy can be defined as the expression of love and empathy for each other. Philanthropy is sharing our private resources for public benefit. Those private resources could be money, goods, ideas, or any sort of participation that can add value.

-FRANKY WELIRANG-
Co-Founder and Chairman, Perhimpunan Filantropi Indonesia (PFI) Indonesian Philanthropy Association

We are at the eve of the SDGs. This is an excellent time for us to reflect on what has worked, and what hasn’t worked with the MDGs so that we move forward with those lessons. The multi-stakeholder partnerships that will be needed in 2016 must be put into place now, so that we can be ready to collectively engage in the Post-2015 Agenda and truly deepen our impact.

-STEPHENV RODRIQUES-
Deputy Country Director, UNDP Indonesia

Many countries around the world are coming to see the SDGs agenda as something that is not just an abstract global ‘compact’, but something that will drive development inside the country. And although the SDGs are very broad, this breadth allows each of us, in any foundation, to see our work within them – and thereby we can see where and how our contribution will make a difference.

-HEATHER GRADY-
Vice President, Rockefeller Philanthropy Advisors

What we learned at the gathering in Jakarta is that the success of SDG implementation will come down to partnerships between all sectors including government, civil society, private business, and philanthropy. It’s vital to have all voices included in this process. To this end, a diverse and robust philanthropic sector in Indonesia will go a long way in amplifying the participation of civil society toward achieving the SDG goals.

Selamat pagi!

I would like to extend a warm welcome to Her Excellency Ibu Puan Maharani, Coordinating Minister for Human Development and Culture, distinguished representatives from ministries, and our colleagues in philanthropy, foundations, development, and the United Nations.

We come together today to work to improve the quality of life of the people of Indonesia. Twenty-five years ago, only 45% of two-year-olds in the country were immunized against measles. Today, that number stands at 84% – clearly a significant improvement.

It is with advancements like this in mind that I welcome you to this workshop – “Fostering Commitment and Leadership for Philanthropy’s Engagement in the Post-2015 Development Agenda for Indonesia” – an exciting collaboration between the government, foundations, the United Nations, and civil society.

Through the connections fostered at this event focused on the Platform for Philanthropy, participants will work to create more strategic – and global – partnerships. These relationships will strengthen the ways we all can work to alleviate poverty and support sustainable development.

Bill and Melinda Gates said this year in their annual giving strategy letter, “there has never been a better time to accelerate progress and have a big impact around the world.”

The time is definitely right for this discussion. It is a meeting that looks to deepening connections and collaborations between major philanthropic players in Indonesia and around the globe as the Millennium Development Goals of 2000 to 2015 come to a close, having been described by many as the world’s most successful anti-poverty push.

Indonesia has already met some of its MDG targets, including the drastic reduction in the poverty rate from 23% in 1999 to 11.5% in 2013, according to government statistics.

But there is more work to be done, and the UN is committed to helping the Government of Indonesia work on three lagging MDGs:

1) Maternal Mortality: According to government numbers, there were around 220 maternal deaths per 100,000 live births in the country. That rate is too high for a lower middle income country like Indonesia.

2) Food Security and Nutrition: 25% of children under five are malnourished in Indonesia and 37% of children are stunted.

3) HIV/AIDS: 658,000 people in Indonesia are living with HIV and the national prevalence rate among adults of 0.43% is still too high.

These issues should be addressed collectively as we look to the next 15 years, and as Indonesia moves to achieving the Sustainable Development Goals to be finalized later this year.
United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon recently said, “We must continue along the path of the MDGs, consolidate their achievements and fill the remaining gaps. Implementation will be the test of this new development agenda. Resources will be crucial. All funds must be tapped – public and private, national and international; and non-financial resources must also be brought to bear.” To fill the gaps Ban Ki Moon is referencing, we are harnessing resources through this platform for philanthropy, especially as we move toward a new partnership platform Post-2015. The UNDP together with the United Nations Development Group has been hosting a series of global conversations to get input on the new SDGs and Indonesia was chosen as one of the pilot countries, together with Kenya, Ghana and Columbia.

This meeting today of key players in the world of philanthropy in Indonesia have a combined grant turnover of approximately US$60 million (IDR 700 billion) per month, according to research done by the local NGO PIRAC (Public Interest Research and Advocacy Center). This figure exposes the important work in areas such as health, education, financial literacy, and employment that is being done in the country by philanthropists.

We know philanthropy and foundations play an essential role in development, having the advantage of greater operating freedom and greater capacity for innovation and risk-taking. And we are aware that in some respects the legal framework needs to be strengthened for them. This would facilitate a more enabling environment for philanthropy and foundations so they can make a greater impact for a better Indonesia.

One of the important elements of the platform is the web portal, a way to help identify opportunities to collaborate with government, development partners, and multilateral associates, including the UNDP. This web portal will make data on philanthropic investments more accessible and transparent, and similar platforms have already been launched in Kenya adn Colombia.

Through the enhanced efficiency and strategic relationships fostered through this partnership platform, I know we can harness the power of collective action to achieve the goals set out in the MDGs and now the SDGs to alleviate poverty and support sustainable development.

I would like to thank our partners: the UNDP, the Foundation Center, Rockefeller Philanthropy Advisors, the Conrad N. Hilton Foundation, the Ford Foundation, and The Mastercard Foundation for fostering this exciting conversation.

Melinda Gates said in a recent interview, “If you look back at history, Carnegie highlighted the need for libraries to be a place where everyone could go to read if you didn’t have access to books. Philanthropy can be a place that will take a risk or point to areas to make sure they are the right government investments to reduce those inequalities.”

Following this sentiment, our call today is simple, to nurture the work of philanthropy in reducing inequality in Indonesia and around the globe.

Thank you.
The first plenary session was moderated by Heather Grady. The panelists were Stephen Rodrigues, David Hulse, Endah Murniningtyas, Jusman S. Jamal, and Yanuar Nugroho.

The discussion focused on the importance of creating concrete partnerships at this stage in order to be ready to collectively address the SDGs in January 2016. A publically accessible central database was a key tool identified for data sharing and overall coordination and collaboration.

Overview of the Panel 1 Discussion:

- The main challenges foreseen with addressing the Post-2015 Agenda will be with mainstreaming the SDGs and doing so without a significant time lag. Further discussion centered on developing an action plan with a shared vision and strong multi-stakeholder linkages between philanthropists & foundations, the UN system, government, and NGOs & Civil Society Organizations (CSOs).
- There was a common appeal to use this workshop to identify concrete ways to facilitate a dialogue between all stakeholders.
- The commitment by the Government of Indonesia to the MDGs and to the SDG transition is encouraging, as are the linkages of social, economic, and environmental development in the SDG framework in a way that is different from the MDGs.
- Participants suggested that philanthropic foundations in Indonesia should aim to be more trusting and open with one another. In doing so, there is a call to capitalize on the wealth of long-term personal connections to foster important collaborations.
- It is important for all actors to gain a more holistic understanding of all that is being done in a given area and by whom. Data sharing using a central database was identified as one avenue to achieve this objective.
- The participants of the panel concluded by stating their support for the Platform and identifying that the UNDP is committed to facilitating these multi-stakeholder partnerships.
The second plenary session was moderated by Desi Anwar. The panelists were Lauren Bradford, Derval Usher, Petra Hoelscher, Belinda Tanoto, and Asep Suryahadi.

This discussion explored the opportunities and challenges related to data sharing and data analysis for program monitoring, coordinating, and development. Two websites were introduced as platforms to facilitate this data sharing process.

Overview of the Panel 2 Discussion:

- There was overall consensus on the importance of fostering trust to facilitate data sharing. This essential trust is the first step in collaborating and sharing. It is through these connections that all shareholders may become more informed and aligned to effectively addressing the SDGs in Indonesia.
- The creation of the website SDGfunders.org aims to clearly showcase data related to philanthropic financial flows globally and locally. It will be launched in September 2015 and will highlight successes, failures and opportunities of existing initiatives to share important lessons learned. With this website, all stakeholders may clearly track development initiatives and progress in one centralized location.
- The website IndonesiaPovertyMap.org has also been created as a means of coordinating Indonesia-specific data that is publicly accessible. This website is currently operational, and features a poverty and livelihood map, NGO profile database, and related reports. The poverty and livelihood map has a multitude of indicators that link with SDG targets, and are disaggregated to the district, sub-district, city, and village levels in Indonesia.
- Many organizations are willing to share their data but are wary of privacy concerns regarding how the data will be used. However, there are methods to address these issues in a mutually beneficial way.
- With the increasing amount of data available, it is a challenge to compile, showcase, and share it all in an efficient and effective way. However, data has the potential to be used to improve existing programs and create more successful new initiatives. Using data to show a complete picture of development activities from different stakeholders will help to ensure there is no unnecessary overlap in a particular a region or sector while others are over looked.
- Big Data may be used to showcase trends and patterns for real-time snapshots of conditions within a given area. These up-to-date analyses aim to equip development actors with information that could lead to more timely, relevant, and focused development interventions.
- Data is important when measuring both the direct and indirect outcomes of a particular localized initiative, and big data is especially important for drawing broader connections. There was a consensus on the need to use program specific data to monitor the impact of development interventions at disaggregated levels (especially at the local level, where the data is scarce).
This discussion provided an overview of the Post-2015 Partnership Platform for Philanthropy, the Platform, its objectives, history and background, current opportunities and challenges, structure, key outcomes and deliverables, further explanation of the SDGfunders.org online portal, and how those in attendance can become involved.

The Platform Objectives:
1. Create and test a mechanism of engagement for philanthropy’s collaboration with UN agencies, government, and NGOs and CSOs.
2. Create a cohesive and accessible map of development work, knowledge, and stakeholders.
3. Generate partnerships around specific themes, in order to match programmes and priorities.
5. Facilitate a dialogue regarding philanthropy’s current and future partnership potential, at both the country and global levels.
6. Enable transparent data sharing.
7. Provide development data for philanthropy to make more informed decisions on programme funding, development, implementation, and coordination.

Expected Outputs & Outcomes:
- Strengthen the position of philanthropy in local and global development initiatives and encourage philanthropy to engage with and report on their alignment with the SDGs.
- Facilitate an enabling environment for philanthropy’s engagement with the Post-2015 Development Agenda (SDGs) and creation of partnerships with UN agencies, local government, and NGOs and CSOs.
- Create a country level map of development work, knowledge, and stakeholders to increase philanthropy’s engagement, partnership opportunities, and alignment with the SDGs and National Development Agenda.
- Launch the online portal SDGfunders.org in September 2015 to serve as a centralized space for collaboration and data & knowledge sharing to measure and track the alignment of the SDGs between stakeholders.
Resource Persons: Agus Susanto, Widyatmoyo Waluyo, Dominic Regester & Ahmad Juwaini
Moderators: Jose Feraris & Lejo Sibbel

Overview of Breakout Session 1:

- The resource persons provided an overview of their connection to education-related development programs in Indonesia. The main topics discussed included: school safety, infrastructure, equal access for special needs students, character building, anti-corruption initiatives, lifelong learning, the importance of focusing on youth as the leaders of tomorrow, and linking educational programs to the gaps in the labour force to combat unemployment.
- This open discussion focused in depth on several of the points raised by the resource persons, including:
  - Access to education beyond the classroom via public libraries and traditional knowledge training.
  - Ensuring accountability with financial audits that are published for public access.
  - Data mapping on educational programs for collaboration.
- There was a desire for further research and analysis of the school-to-work transition in Indonesia, in order to address the issue of unemployment.

Moving Forward: Participants suggested creating a national database as a concrete next step that maps existing efforts as well as provides statistical data needed for region-specific educational programme design and implementation. There was an overall agreement for the need to continue this conversation on a regular basis, in order to focus in on individual elements and promote collaboration and cooperation among stakeholders.
Resource Persons: Restu Prastiwi, Steve Lawry, Nazir Foaed & Steve Rhee
Moderator: Tomoyuki Uno

Overview of Breakout Session 2:

• The resource persons provided an overview of their connections to environmental-based development programs in Indonesia. The main topics discussed included: the increasing role of Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) programmes in Indonesia, philanthropy’s strength in catalyzing innovation and piloting new agendas, and the increasing impact of non-state actors driving forest governance.

• The open discussion focused in depth on several of the points raised by the resource persons, including:
  - The challenges of truly inclusive multi-stakeholder collaborations, given governmental and UN system regulations that restrict partnerships with certain companies and their affiliated CSR programmes or Foundations.
  - The long history of philanthropy’s role in stimulating change and driving empirical experimentation. It was reiterated that philanthropy’s role is not limited to providing funding. Philanthropy is often a leader in innovation and is known to support risky development ideas. If successful, these pilot programmes can then be adopted by those less apt to take such risks, such as the government or NGOs & CSOs. It was agreed that collaboration and cooperation is key in moving forward with the SDGs.

• Without a centralized database or resource to coordinate and identify the needs of the region, philanthropy faces the challenge of identifying specific areas of need and new partners.

Moving Forward: It was agreed that there was a willingness of those present to participate in the working group under the new Platform. However, it is important that there will be more involvement of the Government of Indonesia within this working group.
Moderator: Michael Sianipar

Overview of Breakout Session 3:

- The resource persons provided an overview of their connections to urban-focused development programs in Indonesia. The main topics discussed included: the growing trend of urbanization, the need for integrated urban planning, how to make cities more resilient to climate change related events (i.e. floods, landslides, typhoons, earthquakes, etc.), urban slum alleviation, and the need for coordination between national and city level governments.
- The open discussion focused in depth on several of the points raised by the resource persons, including:
  - How to identify the most appropriate potential partners within a given sector, such as urban development. It was discussed that this Platform may be the solution. Also, that it is important to begin with a common understanding of the issue itself, as a foundation for cooperation.
  - It is important to openly discuss the potential strengths and weaknesses of the stakeholders involved before program implementation. The involvement of local governments is imperative, but capacity building is required. There are roles for each stakeholder, based on their specific strengths.
- There is a need for data and information on the extent to which non-governmental organizations are contributing to local government goals as well as global targets. The challenge is to facilitate shared learning and exchanges in expertise both within and between existing networks. There should be increased public participation in planning and other decision-making processes through multi-stakeholders forums on various issues.
- There is a need to work across SDG silos; for example, collaboration between climate change, slum upgrading, and water and sanitation facilitators will increase overall effectiveness. Although it is difficult for governments to coordinate across agencies, if philanthropy can demonstrate cross-sector coordination, it may serve as an example for the government to follow.

Moving Forward: Participants advocated for the need to develop a regulation that would allow the government to accept assistance (in the form of assets) from philanthropic organizations to help to provide improved public services.
Resource Persons: Diyanto Imam, Hamid Abidin, Mr. Kurina & Arum Atmawikarta
Moderators: Jonathan Pincus

Overview of Breakout Session 4:

• The open discussion was focused on:
  - The similarities and differences between Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) and Philanthropy, and how these differences impact their respective enabling environments. CSR and Creating Shared Value (CSV) were seen as an extension of general responsible business practices. As, ideally, CSR programmes are designed to be mutually beneficial to both the company and communities in which they operate. Whereas philanthropic programmes are designed in alignment with the personal interests of the founders and/or directors, rather than the affiliated company’s focus area.
  - As a means to encourage transparency and accountability, it was suggested that existing CSR regulations should be modified to include mandatory and publicly accessible sustainably reports. However, there was a greater consensus on the merits of facilitating accountability and transparency via tax relief for philanthropy, to incentivize giving. Current tax regulations restrict philanthropic activities, and encourage the channeling of funds through corporate programs rather than individual/private avenues.
  - As a means to encourage transparency and accountability, it was suggested that existing CSR regulations should be changed to include mandatory and publicly accessible sustainably reports.
  - The lack of data sharing was also discussed as a general challenge, especially when addressing the barriers to programme design and implementation created by local autonomy and a lack of localized data.

Moving Forward: A working group was encouraged by participants to address the creation of an enabling environment for collaboration. It is important to include the government in this working group, as national and local regulations were identified as major barriers to philanthropic engagement. The creation of an accessible, coordinated platform for data access was also agreed upon as a positive next step.
Conclusion & Next Steps

1. It is important to have greater coordination, collaboration, and partnership between Government, the UN, foundations and philanthropists. These multi-stakeholder partnerships are important to encourage creative and innovative approaches to solve problems and tackle difficult challenges.

2. It is crucial to include foundations and philanthropic organizations in the governance arrangements and as key partners in national and subnational SDG programmes.

3. Partnerships can help to take successful initiatives and pilots to a larger scale to achieve a greater impact on people’s lives.

4. It is important not to lose sight of the unfinished work of the MDGs, during this transition to the SDGs. However, we need to work together to shorten the learning curve for the SDGs.

5. Data sharing and data mapping is extremely important for tracking the progress of development initiatives, while highlighting areas for improvement and opportunities for new and existing collaborations. At the same time, we need to ensure a certain level of privacy in data management.

6. Continue the momentum generated by this Platform launch by establishing multi-stakeholder working groups to further build and strengthen these important partnerships in Indonesia.
